Cudell and Detroit Shoreway announce "Strategic Alliance"

by Victoria Shea

The boards of Cudell Improvement and Detroit Shoreway Community Development Organization announced in a letter dated June 5th that the two neighborhood organizations have formed a Strategic Alliance that will take effect on July 1, 2018.

NEWS ANALYSIS

The letter, signed by Dan Berry, the President of Cudell Improvement and Joe Tegreene, the Chair of Detroit Shoreway Community Development Organization (DSCDO), states the Strategic Alliance "will provide high quality community development services that leverage expertise and resources across the Cudell, Detroit Shoreway and Edgewater neighborhoods."

"The decision to partner between Cudell and DSCDO was a thoughtful process that took over two years, during which time the organizations built trust and performed thorough due diligence," the letter stated. "This partnership will now provide safety, economic development, neighborhood marketing, vacant and abandoned housing redevelopment, code enforcement and community engagement."

While neither the Cudell Improvement Board President or the Detroit Shoreway Community Development Organization Board Chair were available for comment, as they were still working together to finalize the details of the Alliance, members of the Cudell Improvement board felt strongly about the Alliance, which they hope will strengthen the organizations as a whole.

The letter states: "This collaborative model for leveraging strengths across organizations is not new in the world of non-profits or community development, but it is also uniquely tailored to the needs and culture of Cudell and DSCDO. The strategic alliance will leverage expertise and resources across our neighborhoods, while also creating synergies and cost efficiencies that afford even better service to our residents, businesses, and community members."

The letter also explained that the Collaboration and Shared Services agreement the two boards signed states the organizations will maintain separate organizations and boards, and that they will keep physical offices in the neighborhoods.

The letter is accompanied by series of questions and answers. The questions and answers section mention services will continue to be provided to the Cudell and Edgewater neighborhoods. However, the section does not mention the West Boulevard neighborhood which Cudell Improvement has served for many years, where a number of members of the organization reside, and where its current office is located.

In fact, the question and answers specifically say "services will continue to be provided in the DSCDO service area and to the Cudell and Edgewater neighborhoods, north of I-90 between West 117th St. and West 85th St." There is no mention of the West Boulevard neighborhood and the area South of I-90.

While the letter from the Cudell Improvement Board President and the Detroit Shoreway Community Development Organization Board Chair is addressed to members of the organizations, it is simply an announcement of a decision already made by the respective boards. There is no mention of a process of seeking input from the members of the two organizations on the decision to form a strategic alliance.

Editor's Note: Visit the Plain Press website at www.plainpress.org to view the letter from Cudell Improvement Board President Dan Berry and Detroit Shoreway Community Development Organization Board Chair Joe Tegreene and question and answers that follow the letter.

Strategic Alliance?

The passing of the torch at West Side Community House

by Victoria Shea

"We're here to honor the career, the passion and the legacy of Dawn Kolograf, our fearless leader for twenty-seven-years," proclaims Rachelle Milner, acting as Master of Ceremonies for the celebration to honor Dawn Kolograf's retirement from the West Side Community House. "This has been an awesome experience, and so awesome to sit at your feet."

For the last fifteen years, Milner has been serving as the Family Services Director. Now however, with a smile on her face, she has accepted the torch from Kolograf.

"It has meant so much to me," Milner said in her speech at the ceremony on June 21. "I'm so grateful to you."

When Dawn first arrived at West Side Community House, she joined at a grim time. According to the article written back in 1992 for the Plain Press announcing Dawn's arrival, the director of the Community House, Cynthia Maxwell, has resigned midsummer, the agency had been thrust into the middle of the St. Ignatius High School expansion issue; there was a six-figure deficit and relationships between management and the Social Agencies Employees Union, District 1199 was strained.

Since then, under Dawn's leadership, the Community House has experienced various changes. The most significant difference was when Kolograf decided to "follow poverty" and move the Community House from its location at West 30th Street and Bridge Avenue to its present location at West 93rd and Lorain.

Kolograf's service to the Community House was also recognized. On behalf of the board, Board President Bob Moran presented her with a glass plaque honoring her years of tireless service and dedication. "Dawn had been a tireless and dedicated leader of this organization," he said.

But for Kolograft, she stressed

"Running the Community House has always been a team effort" that she learned by experience. Before becoming the Executive Director, she stated that she had excellent role models that "demonstrated the importance of having a staff of mission-driven people for whom the work was a calling, not just a job." It was something she would follow throughout her career, with diverse services at Salvation Army, Big Brother/Big Sister and Alta House.

During her speech, Kolograf reflected on those experiences, and stated that the first few years at West Side Community House were a "trial-by-fire" but that she "got through with considerable help and support."

However, she never considered the success of the Community House her own. "Running the Community House has always been a team effort," Kolograf said. "Your inspiration, determination and belief in our mission has always made West Side Community House such a very special place—a warm, welcoming place where kindness prevails even when situations become difficult. But warmth and kindness come from people not from buildings, and you are all the people who make up this place, no matter who the director is."

On passing the torch to Rachelle Milner, Kolograf spoke of the leadership, creativity, warmth and kindness Rachelle has to offer as the Community House's twenty-second Executive Director and stated that she felt comfortable leaving the Community House "in the hands of someone who loves it as much as I do."

In her speech, Milner thanked Kolograf for her service: "I'm so grateful to you. I thank you for your passion. I thank you for your dedication. I thank you for being mission-minded and driven."

County Medical Examiner shares thoughts on how to intervene to prevent more overdoses

by Victoria Shea

It is a topic Doctor Thomas Gilson is passionate about. It shows in every presentation he gives. Yet, people in his county, young and old, are still dying. The numbers are still rising. He wonders, as many others do in law enforcement-what else can they do to stop the senseless deaths. Taking a deep breathe, he sighs, pointing to the graph displayed by the projector on the wall. "There is a lot going on in this story that I'm gonna spend the next hour talking about." Gilson's right-there is. And what he is going to touch on, is only going to be the tip of the iceberg.

Since 2011, Doctor Thomas Gilson has served as the Cuyahoga County Medical Examiner and Director of the Crime Lab. His audience was a group of concerned licensed funeral directors from the State of Ohio attending the Buckeye State Funeral Directors Convention on June 15. His topic is the evolution of the opioid epidemic in Ohio. His focus is mainly the overdose deaths from heroin and fentanyl that have risen since his arrival in the county.

Ohio has the second highest per capita of opioid overdoses death rates in the country, Gilson announces. This catches the attention of several of the directors. "We have the most absolute highest number of deaths in the country as well," Gilson adds.

For Gilson, the crisis has what he refers to as the three phases: prescription drugs, heroin and finally, illicitly-manufactured fentanyl. The state, he says, is partially to blame for the first phase. He is of course, referring to pill mills, which Ohio pioneered to have, and then when they realized there was a problem, pioneered to close. Gilson says with the pill mills gone, prescription drug overdoses have declined.

While many would say that is a good thing, Gilson notes that while the prescribing of opioid pain relievers is declining, there have been recent rises in the number people using heroin and illicitly-manufactured fentanyl.

In 2007, a total of 97 prescription opioid drug overdoses were reported in Cuyahoga County. Forty additional overdoses were contributed to heroin.

In 2008 and 2009, the number of heroin deaths rose to and stayed at 64. By 2010, 91 deaths reported were due to heroin. In 2012 and 2013 the number of heroin related deaths passed the total of opioid overdose deaths by 161 to 111 and 194 to 124 respectively. Since then, that number has only continued to rise in the county. By 2016, which is the last completed year data available, the number of heroin overdoses was 320 deaths.

"The heroin issue was brought up by a good employee doing her job in the toxicology lab at the medical examiner's office," Gilson has been quoted saying. She brought it up because she had worked in the toxicology lab once before, had left and then returned. Gilson said it reminded him of a conversation he had in New Hampshire in 1998 where Gilson himself expressed concern in the rising number of oxycodone deaths. He said it made him take the employee's concern seriously.

Hitting his stride in his presentation, Gilson continues. He knows that while funeral directors may not be able to stop the drug overdoses, they understand where he is coming from. They are like him, speaking for the dead, and on the behalf of the dead. They are in the front lines like himself and the law enforcement officers. They see what the drug overdoses do, not just to the user, but to the families.

"Why does the mortality rise so fast in heroin?" Gilson asked rhetorically. "Because if I buy 80mg of oxycodone off the street that was diverted, that went through a quality assurance process. It's 80mg of oxycodone. Heroin is just a product you buy on the street. Is it this pure, or that pure? Don't know. As a result, the mortality takes off a lot faster."

He goes on to explain that the decline in prescription overdoses is because heroin is cheaper and easier to obtain. Although heroin comes as either a white or brown powder or as a sticky black substance known as "black tar," in Cleveland, Gilson and his staff are seeing the brown powder more frequently. He explains that between the two coasts, knowing the difference in what heroin type is used makes a difference as fentanyl is introduced as the drug epidemic becomes worse.

"People on the west coast are more use to black tar heroin. People on the east coast, white powder,

Community Roundtable on Transit urges the creation of better, safer and more affordable public transit

Ohioans for Gun Safety calls for background checks

by Chuck Hoven

Retired school teacher Dave Eggert and Clinical Psychologist Dr Terry Tobias were both drawn to work for greater gun safety as a result of the Sandy Hook Elementary School shooting where 20 children, ages six and seven, as well as six adults, were killed by a single shooter.

"As a former teacher, I had to do something," said Eggert referencing Sandy Hook.

Eggert, a Cleveland Heights resident, who is married to an ordained minister, urged people to put "God before guns." He said he believes "too many Americans are putting Second Amendment rights before the First and Second Commandments."

Dr Terry Tobias said, "Sandy Hook hit me hard. It was heartbreaking. As a civilized society, we should be able to do more to prevent gun violence."

Eggert and Tobias came to St. Malachi Parish Hall on June 10 to speak to about 30 people regarding their efforts to place an issue on the Ohio ballot that would require what they termed "common sense background checks" for gun purchasers.

Eggert says after researching the issue of background checks, Ohioans for Gun Safety determined "common sense background checks were something practical that we could achieve."

Under the Brady Bill passed in 1994, Eggert says individuals in the United States purchasing a gun through a licensed gun dealer are required to have a background check through the National Instant Criminal Background Check System.

However, there are loopholes in the background checking system currently in place in the State of Ohio. The biggest, says Eggert is that it doesn't cover all gun sales. Private gun sales between unlicensed sellers don't require a background check. Persons prohibited from buying a gun from a dealer, such as felons, fugitives and those with a domestic violence misdemeanor on their record, can purchase a firearm in a private gun sale.

Support is high, says Eggert, for closing the background check

by Chuck Hoven

Organizers of a Community Roundtable on Transit said they hope to create a new vision for the Greater Cleveland Regional Transit Authority and stop the cycle of service cuts, fare increases and ridership loss.

In an effort to bring about their vision of a better, safer and more affordable public transit system, several community groups, Clevelanders for Public Transit, Linking Employment Abilities and Potential (LEAP), Northern Ohioans for Budget Legislation Equality (NOBLE) and Policy Matters Ohio, joined in a collaborative partnership to hold the Community Roundtable on Transit on June 21. Seventy-five people gathered at the Old Stone Church on Public Square to participate in the roundtable.

Before breaking into small discussion groups, some speakers addressed the group as a whole.

Skshai Singh of Clevelanders for Public Transit shared some information about the past successes of the organization founded in 2015. Singh spoke about a successful effort to stop fare increases from taking place this year; the reopening of Public Square to bus service and the completion of a survey of public transit users. Singh noted that the three primary concerns of Greater Cleveland Regional Transit Authority (GCRTA or RTA) riders were cost, service and safety.

Singh criticized the poor record of the State of Ohio in funding public transit. He said that Ohio was one of the lowest state funders of public transit in the nation.

Chairman of the Clevelanders for Public Transit Fair Fares Committee, Marvin Ranaldson, shared some measures his committee has explored to help make RTA more affordable for riders. Ranaldson urged that RTA bring back transfers. He called for a fair fare pass amount that would allow single trip or daily pass riders to build up to the amount of a monthly pass and then ride for free the remainder of the month after they had reached that level. This, he said, would help riders that could not come up with enough for a monthly pass up-front.

He noted the escalation of the cost of a single trip fare has increased from $1.25 in 2006 to $2.50 today. This, he says, along with a thirty percent cut in service has resulted in a death spiral for RTA which is now at an all-time low in ridership. Ranaldson also called for more local and state funding for public transit to help increase service to assure that "people can get to where they need to go in a timely manner."

A Midtown employer spoke, stressing the importance of public transit in making life affordable for potential employees. He said that a study by the Fund for our Economic Future found that the average Cleveland family was spending forty-one percent of their household income on housing and transportation. He said the cost of having a car is about $9,300 per year and noted you could save that amount by giving up a car and taking public transit. He called fair funding of public transit "one of the biggest economic development projects we can have."

Gloria Aron of Northern Ohioans for Budget Legislation Equality urged those present to work for "a safe, affordable transit system that meets the needs of all of us." She said RTA is a public transit system and it is "our responsibility to hold RTA accountable and make sure it is working for us."

Aron called for an increase in the county sales tax that would be dedicated to the RTA. She also shared her history of using the bus, as she used it as a way to go to work during the 1990s. She now uses the bus to go shopping or take her grandchildren on trips to the Great Lakes Science Center. But she warned that if RTA rates go any higher, it would be cheaper to go by Uber.

Aron talked about cuts in service. She said that a cousin was unable to take a job located on Rockside Road because no bus would take him there.

Aron also called for the restoration of the Madison/Bridge bus, saying that residents along those corridors have to go to Lorain or Detroit Avenue's to catch the bus.

In addition, she called for bringing back the Zoo bus, which took riders directly to the entrance of the zoo. As the bus now drops off at the top of the hill leading down to the zoo, she mentioned the challenges of taking a toddler down the steep hill and then back up it.

Aron finished by saying she felt RTA should be running promotional ads on their buses aimed at parents and grandparents, urging them to take their children or grandchildren to destinations such as the Science Center or Zoo via the bus.

Lynn Solomon of Clevelanders for Public Transit said that when she first arrived in Cleveland in 1976, she loved the bus system. She could get anywhere and got very familiar with Cleveland by taking the bus. She said that often, she would explore new areas of the city by taking a different bus to her destination.

After 20 years as a bus rider, Solomon said, her mother convinced her to get a car. She was married and had children, so the car made her more assessable if the children had an emergency. Solomon said after her children were grown, her car continually broke down, and she decided to go back to riding the bus. But when she returned to the RTA system, she noticed a big difference from before. Routes had been cut out, it cost a lot more, and it took longer to get to where she wanted to go. Solomon said, "I thought RTA was dying."

Zach Schiller of Policy Matters Ohio said the Ohio Department of Transportation did a study which said the state should be spending $120 million per year on public transit. Instead, the state allocates only $40 million to public transit, and most of that is from the federal government, he said.

When Medicaid Managed Care Organizations (MCO) that used to pay sales tax were removed from the tax base, RTA lost about $20 million a year in local sales tax revenue, said Schiller. The state legislature tried to design a fix with a franchise fee to make up the loss; however Governor John Kasich vetoed the fix.

Schiller talked about some sources of revenue that could be used to help fund public transit. He said the State Legislature passed a law saying cities cannot tax companies like Uber and Lyft. Schiller urged citizens to contact the legislature and let them know that they do not think this is a good idea.

He then spoke of two unexpected developments that could be sources of revenue. Schiller said the State of Ohio has a $400 million surplus this year. He said the state could efficiently use the surplus to make up for the MCO sales tax cuts to RTA for at least one year. "They have the money, they should do it," he said.

The morning of the roundtable discussion, Schiller said the U.S. Supreme Court announced that states for the first time can now require online retailers to collect sales tax even if they do not have a physical presence in the state. Schiller said, with just a few changes in state law, online companies could begin paying sales taxes in Ohio. He estimated that statewide, this would bring in anywhere from $280 million to $450 million per year. Some of that would go directly to RTA via the local sales tax, he said.

Schiller again urged citizens to call their state representatives and senators to urge them to take actions on both the budget surplus and the online sales tax. Transit riders attending the meeting had many additional suggestions as well as complaints about RTA. One resident complained that the No. 8 bus on Cedar that once ran every 20 minutes, now runs once per hour. Akshai Singh, in response to the rider's concern, noted that when bus service s reduced to less than two or three buses per hour, ridership declines.

A rider suggested that RTA could do a better job in Public Relations and Marketing. She said many church groups like to go places, and RTA should market which buses would take the groups to various

Cleveland Public Library aids in creating personal style among its patrons

by Silk Allen

Maybe you aren't into sewing or knitting, but you still want to make a personal statement with your clothes. The Cleveland Public Library is equipped to handle that.

Usually when you think of the library, you rarely think of fashion and personal style, but the main branch downtown is helping to change that by providing patrons access to software and technology that allows them to personalize anything they can imagine.

The Tech Central Maker Space has a variety of high tech machinery including a laser engraver and cutter, a 3D printer and scanner, and professional level photography, videography, graphic design and music recording and production software and equipment, but the most popular machines are the vinyl printer and cutter and the heat press.

"Most of the use is for the heat press", said Library Assistant Alison Guerin. "Lots of guys come in to print on clothing."

FASHION

You can bring on t-shirts, jeans, jackets, canvas bags- even socks- whatever you can think of- and personalize it with a logo, a photo of your kid, a favorite celebrity, a song lyric or a fun message.

The process is fairly simple with the hardest part being able to come up with an idea. Guerin explained that depending on how detailed the image is, the majority of time is spent prepping the final image in the software program Corel Draw and then weeding the design out once printed.

If you already have an idea and it's simple, you can be in and out in two hours or less. Come in, download your image, import it into the software, print it and then use the heat transfer to press it onto your item of clothing.

Although DIY (do it yourself) is highly encouraged, there is always a designated staff member available to help at every step of the way because there is a slight learning curve to working the software and equipment. The library also offers tutorials on each of the machines via their Maker Monday series that travels to each neighborhood branch throughout the year.

The Maker Space is available to all patrons age 18 and up (14 and up with a guardian) that have a library card and are in good standing with the library. There is no charge to use the equipment and you only pay for the supplies you use, allowing patrons to come in and affordably experiment with equipment that they might not otherwise have access to.

In addition to designing images on clothes, you can also create buttons with the button maker, design a wooden medallion or a pair of earrings with the laser cutter, or use the 3D printer to design a custom bracelet.

Library staff have seen patrons get creative by bringing in their own materials like exotic snakeskin leathers used to engrave and customize the tongues of their sneakers, and the creation of laser engraved pins, button holes and glass beads. According to staff, with the right type of (approved) fabric, you can create anything. And yes, you can also learn how to knit, sew, embroider and crochet- check with your neighborhood branch to see when and where classes are offered.

The Maker Space is open Monday-Saturday from 10 a.m.- 5:30 p.m. Fridays and Saturdays are for walk ins, but reservations are strongly encouraged for Mon.- Thursday by calling 216-623-2980. To find out more information visit the Cleveland Public Library's website at www.cpl.org.

MEDICAL EXAMINER

brown powder," he explains. "Fentanyl is a white powder. So, if you sell white powder to somebody on the west coast, they're like wait a minute, that's not my heroin."

A chemistry major, Gilson cannot avoid the quick chemistry lesson that comes when talking of heroin. Used to wean morphine addicts, Gilson declares that this was a terrible drug to use because as it breaks down in the body, it becomes morphine. The good, that came out of the morphine abuse in the early 20th century, was the drug schedule system, which assigned numbers to drugs based on their acceptable medical use and the drug's abuse or dependency potential. According to the Drug Enforcement Administration's website, heroin falls into Schedule 1, which are defined as drugs with no currently accepted medical use and a high potential for abuse.

The number of heroin deaths in Cuyahoga County, Gilson said, was like taking a jumbo jet and crashing it into Lake Erie every year. With this in mind, the Poison Death Review Committee was formed to review all heroin deaths. It featured representatives from medical, treatment, public health and law enforcement areas to ensure a well-rounded panel of experts.

What was discovered was that heroin overdoses were mainly of the male predominance with a four-to-one ratio. They lived in the suburbs, not downtown Cleveland as one would expect. Those dying were predominantly white, and as Gilson called it, the shocker, was that this was not the cause of death for those in the teens and twenties, but rather, those 45 to 60 years of age. In fact, those in their teens and twenties were the least likely to die from heroin overdoses. The rational behind this was those dying were ones who had gotten hooked on prescription pain medication and had switched to heroin.

It was also discovered that the number of people dying of heroin overdoses while in proximity of another person was approximately seventy percent, with fifty-eight percent of the bystanders not using drugs. It was determined that wider access to naloxone might save lives from heroin overdoses, which was the creation of Project DAWN.

Shocking still was that forty-eight percent of those who had died of a heroin overdose had received substance abuse treatment or detoxification within two years of their deaths. Forty percent of those who died had been incarcerated within two years of their deaths. This allowed the committee to realize that treatment facilities and jails were potential intervention points for educational activities such as how to handle a drug overdose and use naloxone.

He also knows that if given the chance, two-thirds of them will stop using if they live long enough.

While the numbers do most of the talking for him, Gilson knows facts the numbers don't always reflect. He knows that while many, including those sitting before him, may think drug users are just party people, many drug users want to quit using. He also knows that if given the chance, two-thirds of them will stop using if they live long enough. But he knows his numbers don't clearly show that. He must use his words to explain that to the audience. He must try and made them understand.

"I don't want to see people go back to using drugs," he announces to the crowd. This statement does not appear to catch anyone off guard. For those in attendance, the shocker would be if he said he did. "But I'm smart enough to know that won't happen."

So, he explains what happens as you take heroin and how as you use the drug. The doses at which you use it begin to rise to increase the high. He also explains the downfall when something happens like going to a treatment facility or jail. You come out and go back to using the same amount you were using before you went in. Instead of getting the high with everything alright, you wind up on his autopsy table instead.

Proving that prescription drugs were helping the cause of the heroin overdoses, it was determined that seventy-three percent of heroin overdose victims had a file with the Ohio Automated RX Registry System and within two years of their deaths had received a legal prescription for a controlled substance. This information showed that a high percentage of fatal overdose victims were receiving legal prescriptions for narcotics despite a state prescription drug monitoring program.

Despite the negative information discovered by the committee, according to the State of Ohio Board of Pharmacy, the Ohio Automated Rx Reporting System has worked. In 2011, there were 782 million solid doses of opioids prescribed in Ohio. By 2015, that number had decreased seventeen percent to 701 million solid doses.

If only that was the end of the story, Gilson thinks, as he ready's himself to begin the final phase. He knows the story-he lives it-everyday he sees it. While the numbers are starting to decrease, even slowly, in heroin, fentanyl is on the rise. He knows what he is about to say as he looks at the graph once more showing the deaths from heroin, cocaine, fentanyl and all opioids...

"This purple drug is fentanyl, and fentanyl started to take off," He says before pausing. "We had thirty-seven overdose deaths in 2014, but I can tell you, thirty of those happened in November and December of that year."

An already silent room has sudden become even more silent if that is possible for a moment. He knows that his audience is processing this information. How is that possible? He knows it is. He saw it happen. So, he continues.

"The number rose up to ninety, ninety-two in 2015," he announces. "This drug is starting to make its appearance." But he continues with the numbers. By 2016, there are 399 dead from overdoses. 2017 he sees the number up to 492.

But why is fentanyl on the rise? He knows this a question on everyone's minds. It must be. It was certainly on his at one point he is certain. He explains, now in greater detail than before when he first started his presentation. He knows that this has to do with the potency of fentanyl. He knows that the potency has to do with the high. "Its potency is substantially more than heroin," he explains. "We use morphine as a base line, and heroin is about four to five times the potency of morphine. Fentanyl is about eighty to a hundred times the potency."

But he continues. He must make those here that could help make a difference understand. Fentanyl is unforgiving. Much more so than heroin.

Naloxone can help in a fentanyl overdose, he states, but you have to be there with it fast and you better have a lot of it. You must have those things on your side to have a chance with a fentanyl overdose.

But like everything else, the real reason it is on the rise is because it is cheap to make. And therefore, cheap to sell and cheap to purchase.

Yet, even after saying his peace, he knows that he cannot in good faith send these funeral directors back into their neighborhoods without a bit of hope. He has some good news-it is not much, but still, it is a start, so he announces it. He's not seeing as many deaths from drugs this year. He doesn't have all the numbers yet, but he knows it is going down.

He knows that his county has much more to do to combat the drug epidemic. But with the numbers going down, even slightly, he knows that something they are doing is helping.

He is making a difference. Even if it's a small one.

GUN SAFETY

loopholes. He cites statistics saying 77 percent of gun owners support such measures as do 87 percent of non-gun owners, 70 percent of Republicans, and 88 percent of Democrats.

Twenty-one states have already closed the background check loophole says, Eggert. He says states have taken action because of substantial evidence that more background checks result in fewer deaths of women from domestic violence, reduced gun trafficking and fewer aggravated assaults.

While other states have strengthened their background check laws, Ohio is moving in the opposite direction. Bills that have passed in Ohio in recent years are relaxing gun laws, not reinforcing them, said Dr Tobias. As a result, she said Ohioans for Gun Safety has little confidence that the State of Ohio Legislature would act to close loopholes in the background checking system. So, she said, the group plans to take their proposal directly to voters in 2019 or 2020.

To place the proposal on the ballot, Dr Tobias said the Ohioans for Gun Safety would need to gather close to 200,000 signatures.

Eggert says to get that effort underway, Ohioans for Gun Safety is looking for people or organizations that are willing to be groundbreakers and host events so they can present their idea to voters and listen to their feedback.

Dr Tobias says this initial stage will be a listening campaign and participants will be surveyed to help create clearly written ballot language for the proposal and to decide whether to pursue a new state law or an amendment to the state constitution.

Eggert encouraged those that want to get involved by providing financial help, hosting a house party or informational event, or by pledging their support for common-sense background checks to visit the Ohioans for Gun Safety website at www.ohioansforgunsafety.com.

Thursday, May 31, 2018; Burke Lakefront Airport, 1501 N. Marginal Road: "Doc" a World War II B-29 Superfortress, stopped in Cleveland during its 2018 summer tour. "Doc" is one of two B-29's still flying.

A rare piece of World War II history dances into Cleveland on "laughter-silvered wings"

by Victoria Shea

A rare sight to behold arrived in the warm afternoon of May 31 at Burke Lakefront Airport in the form of "Doc," the lone survivor of a B-29 bomber group, "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs."

"It was hard to miss," retired U.S. Coast Guard Lieutenant Commander Robert Shields explained, having heard "Doc" flying over his residence in Bay Village, Ohio, "There is no missing the purring of radial engines."

Doc was accompanied into Burke by two other World War II era warbirds -- a B-25J Mitchell Bomber, "Georgie's Gal" based at the Liberty Aviation Museum in Port Clinton, Ohio; and a P-51C Red Tail Mustang, "Tuskegee Airmen" based in Red Wing, Minnesota. "Doc" is just one of two airworthy B-29 Superfortresses left flying (the other being "Fifi" based in Addison, Texas).

Glistening with her spit-shine polish in the late afternoon sun on the tarmac behind the International Women's Air and Space Museum, located inside the airport terminal, one would never imagine that when she was found almost 30-years-ago, "Doc" was a sight for sore eyes.

"Tyres were all dry-rotted and flat, and it has sunk into the sand," explained a former volunteer and friend of "Doc" while waiting for his chance to board. "It was there and still in one piece, but it was vandalized, windows had been broken, and it had graffiti on it."

Located in a remote corner of China Lake, a Naval Air Weapons Station in California, it was a challenge to get "Doc" back to her present state. The owner of the B-29, Tony Massolini, of South Euclid, Ohio contacted the U.S. Air Force in search of a B-29 to restore but was informed that all remaining B-29s had been sent to China Lake to be used for aerial bombing practice. Determined, Massolini then reached out to the U.S. Navy, who confirmed the Air Force's story, stating that they had blown up all the B-29s when they were used for strafing practice.

But luck would be on Massolini's side when a janitor stationed at China Lake located a lone B-29 in the remote corner of the station, which had "slipped through the cracks." With this information in hand, Massolini drove out to China Lake and with the base commander, went to locate "Doc." Upon seeing the airplane, the base commander was quoted as saying, "Son of a gun. I didn't know this was here."

After obtaining all needed permissions, Massolini's next task was to get the B-29 off China Lake's property. Shutting down the station for a couple of hours, along with a bulldozer and new tyres made from molds located in England, Massolini and his crew pulled the B-29 off U.S. government property and to a small airfield nearby. From there, the plane was disassembled, placed on flatbeds and trucked to Wichita, Kansas to the Boeing plant where she was originally built. The next sixteen years saw volunteers from far and wide across the U.S. arriving to help get "Doc" back to airworthy flying status. It was worth it when in June 2016 "Doc" returned to the skies for her first flight.

Currently out on summer tour, "Doc" is expected to make a minimum of nine stops in five states, with additional tour stops to be added throughout the tour season. "Doc's Friends" spokesman, Josh Wells said that the mission of the B-29 is history.

"Our mission is to honor the Greatest Generation and connect and educate current and future generations with the rich history of the B-29 as it relates to our nation's history," writes Wells on the B-29's website. But there is hope that somewhere in the future, "Doc" will be able to provide Living History Flight rides in the historic aircraft as well to help enhance the history already being taught.

"Doc" is scheduled to return home sometime in the fall to Wichita, Kansas. In the meantime, those looking for additional information about "Doc" are encouraged to visit www.b29doc.com.

TRANSIT

sites in Cleveland.

Singh suggested that instead of playing loud, obnoxious commercials for other companies, RTA could be promoting itself on its buses and rapid lines.

Singh also suggested that those with smartphones download the Transit App. The app, he said, will find your location and tell you where the nearest bus or rapid line is, as well as the next scheduled arrival.

Newly elected RTA Board President, Dennis Clough, said, "it all comes down to funding" when referring to implementing some of the suggestions made. "We don't want a temporary fix," he said. "We want something that is going to be lasting. All ideas need to be explored."

Ward 5 City Council Representative and Chair of City Council Transportation Committee, Phyllis Cleveland, called public transit a social justice issue. Her ward, which includes Central, Kinsman and North Broadway, is the most deprived council ward in Cleveland. She said many of the residents in Ward 5 either don't have cars or access to cars. "People in my community largely depend on public transit."

Cleveland said while she agrees with Clough's statement that a long-term solution is needed, she also feels the public is facing a critical situation soon due to the loss of the Medicaid tax. She said RTA's budget has to be balanced and if there is not enough revenue, service gets cut. Those cuts will affect both riders and RTA employees. "A real short-term crisis has to be dealt with—we have to come up with a solution, for now, that is viable."

Furthermore, Cleveland speculated about how the scandals at RTA would play out politically and if they would hinder the passage of a sales tax. Her suggestion was to possibly create a body like the Bond Accountability Commission that was created to monitor spending of the Cleveland Metropolitan School District's Bond issue to fund its Facilities Plan.

As well, she suggested outlining specifically what more RTA would have to do if the levy were to pass. In promoting the levy, RTA could say: "this is what your additional dollars would pay for," she said.

William Nix, President of Local 268 of the Amalgamated Transit Union (ATU), talked about union members being laid off during budget cuts at RTA. He said the workforce on the rail line has been reduced from 100 employees to 40, and the rail system does have state of the art equipment.

Nix was also critical of RTA Chief Executive Officer Joe Calabrese for not pushing for a tax increase to stabilize the transit system. Noting that long-time Board President George Dixon got away with not paying health insurance premiums for decades, Nix said union members have to swipe their cards to make sure their premiums are up to date before they can come back to their jobs after being laid off for six months. The union member suggested new management at RTA from the top down would help to restore trust in the system.

Following comments from speakers and attendees, those present at the roundtable broke into discussion groups to discuss topics related to RTA service and affordability. Topics included: service hours, service frequency, coverage area regarding the bus getting someone where they want to go, accessibility and availability of ticket machines and lastly, affordability.

Many of those in attendance signed a letter to RTA Board of Trustees members and elected county officials urging the placement of a levy on the November ballot. The letter, composed by Clevelanders for Public Transit, closed by saying, "I am calling on you to put a levy on the ballot this November to raise the necessary revenue to restore GCRTA to a level of service that meets all the needs of our great community."

Clevelanders for Public Transit plan to hold a rally on July 23 to urge RTA's Board to put transit funding on the November ballot. The group hopes to attract transit riders to that rally. Those interested in attending should meet at the RTA's headquarters located at 1240 W. 6th St. at 5 p.m. The rally will take place on the south side of Public Square starting at 5:30 p.m. For more information about Clevelanders for Public Transit, upcoming events and their Fair Fares Plan visit www.clefortransit.org or @CLEforTransit on Facebook or Twitter.
